

I understand how the agency is wanting to make all vehicles safe for people but that alone is the problem. For, I would like every vehicle to be safe for the people, that accomplishment would be great. Yet, then looking back in history nothing can be perfect. No car can have all the gadgets that everyone wants in there and still be perfectly safe for the people. The all-around perfect car is ridiculous in the aspect that physics over rule any factor to make a car perfectly safe, as they issues of force, momentum, velocity, etc. would all have to be taking into mind to make it perfect. which is virtually impossible because there is not enough time or man power to make it happen. There would end up being one or two types of cars to pass the tests and thats it. Thus, limiting the freedom of choice of the people on this subject. Doing it to inform the people is fine, but doing it to regulate which cars go on the market is ridiculous.
